THE STRONG DIVORCE CASE .- Judge Jones, of the Suparior Court, has delivered an opinion in the case of Peter R. Strong aget. Mary E. S rong, in the mo of Peter R. Strong agast. Many E. S. rong, in the motion to compel Mr. Strong to pay his wite's leval expenses in defending the suit brought by him against let. The opinion is very long and elaborate. The Judge aya: I think it may be regarded as a seneral rule, that when an action for divorce is brought against the wife, and she in her answer either denied her guilt of acts or set up affi mative defenses, such as forgiveness er recrumnation, or dees both, counsel ieee and alimouv will be allowed her, unless the Court is satisfied that the wife is altowed the court is attended to determine the wrong, or has no reasonable ground of determe, in which case the Court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, may request counsel fee and alimony." The opinion then defines when alimony is flowable end says: "Let us consider the card of the jurors. By that it appars that the disagreement was upon the recriminatory charges, and that the jury stood two for the detendant real between the first was upon the recriminatory charges, and that the jury stood two for the detendant real between the plantiff. It she on the past trial has been able to produce such proof of the truth of her recriminatory charges as to cause two jurors to believe them to be true, the Court cannot say but that she may utilinately succeed in causing the whole twelve to believe them the." It concludes: "I have come to the concustion that counsel fees and alimony should be allowed. As, nowever, defendant's counsel on the argument expressly waived and abandoned that portion of the motion was checked for alimony, and acclined to receive it. I shall not order it. The Court will not thrust on a party a favor which he coes not ask but expressly declines. ### A Horrible Double Murder.

The town of Medica, Michigan, was the scene, on Sunday last, of one of the most atrocious double murders ever committed. The perpetrator is named Isaac Vanacter, a farmer forty years of age, and his victims are his wife and step-daughterand his victims are his wife and step-daughter—the latter aged 11 years. He has borne a bad ch-racter among his neighbors, being or a quarrelsome disposition, addicted to the use of intexacting 1 guers, and has served a term in the State Pr.son for grand larceny. I, appears from the concession of the murderer, who is in prison, that is the morning, in a dispute between Vanasterand his wife, his son, about 16 years of age, who was present, endeavored to queet the old man, but aiding left the seene. On a former occasion, when a quarrel occurred between the couple, the wife has invoked the assistance of her brother, who lives near their tarm. Remembering this fact, the old man concluded that has son had again gone to his uncle for assistance, and immediately after his dejarture he edzed an axe and struck his wife on the heat with it, knocaing her down and stunning her. On seeing tar mother tall, the little girl ning her. On seeing har mother fall, the little girl attempted to quit the house, but was pursued by Vinacier, whe, overtaking her, knocked her in the head, as he had his wife. Returning to the prostrate form of the latter, the brute, discovering some signs of life, struck her once or twice more with the edge of the axe, splitting her skull and cutting a learful gash in her neck. He then went to where the little girl was lying, and soon extinguished the Vital spark. After the commission of the horrible decas, the murderer took his gun and followed siter his son, and endeavored to shoot him. He failed in the attempt, however as the boy, before starting from the house, had ramoved the caps. The old vinlain them returned to his house, and remained until the officers of the law came and secured him. On seeing har mother fall, the little gir

In the Wrong House.

It was like getting home. It was snug and private. I had a chair there waiting me. I thought to myself that many a man would take a deal ce trouble to break into such a house. I wondered how Jack Shepherd felt on such occasions. I had seen him at the Adelphi. He would make nothing of getting down into the street from the window, of getting down into the street from the window, spoons and all. I tried this; the shutters were not even closed, and the sash moving notselessly. I had no difficulty in raising it. I stepped out upon the balcony, and looked over. Nothing was to seem but a black and yawning guif beneath, guarded by the imaginary spikes of an invisible railing. Jack would have laughed at this difficulty, but then he had more experience in the craft than I, and was provided with all necessary aprilances. As for me, I had stupidly forgotten even my coil of rope. The governor's house, I found, had either no balcony at all, or it was too far apart to be reached. Presently I heard a footstep on the trottoir, a little way off. It was approaching with slow and measured pace; the person was watking as ca'mly and gravely in the night as though is bad teen broad day. Suppose Italied the philosophical stranger, and confided to him, in a friendly way, the fact that the baronet, without the slightest provocation, had locked me up in his house with his silver spoons in my pocket? Perhaps he would advise me what to do in the predicament. Perhaps ne would take the trouble of knocking as the door, or crying fire, and when the servants opender, in this trush out and so make my escape. Bus while I was looking wistfully down to see if I could not discern the wisting figure, which was now under the windows, a sudden glare from the spot dazzled my sight. It was the bull's eye of a pointernan: and with the finstitut of a predatory character, I shrauk back trembling, crept into the room, and shut the window. spoons and all. I tried this; the shutters were character. I shrauk back trembling, crept into ane room, and shut the window.

By this time I was sensible that there was a little confusion in my shoughts, tand by way of employing them on practical and useful objects. I determined to make a tour of the room. But first, is was necessary to get rid, somehow or other, of my plunder, to plant the property, as we call it; and with that view. I laid it carsfully, piece by niece, in the corner of a sofa, and concealed it with the corner.

This was a great relief. I almost began to feel like the injured party—more like a captive than a robber; and I groped my way through the rooms with a sort of a vague idea that I might penhaps stumble upon some trap door, or sliding pannel, which would lead into the open air, or, as worst into a secret chamber, where I should be safe for any given number of years from my persecutors. But there was nothing of the kind in this stern, presaic place; nothing but a few cabinets and tables, and couches, and arm chairs, and common chairs, and devotional chairs; and footstools, and lamps, and statuettes, and glass-shades, and knick-knacks, and one elaborate girandole hung round knacks, and one elaborate girandole hung round with crystal prisms, which played such an interminatic tune against each other when I chanced to move them, that I stum led away as fast as I could, and subsited into, a fauteuit so rich, so deep, that I is myself swallowed, as it were, in its pillows of away of corn, a fauteuit so rich, so deep, that I call myself swallowed, as it were, in its pillows of swan's down.

How long I had been in the house by this time. It cannot tell. It seemed to me, when I looked back, to form a considerable portion of a lifetime. Indeed, I did not very well remember the more distant events of the night; although every now and then she fact occurred to me with startling distinctness, that ad I had gone through; that preliminary to some hing still to happen; that the morning was to come, the laml; to be assir, and the housebreaker to be apprehensed. My reflections were not continuous. I may be that I does between whiles. How else can I account for my teeling myself grasped by the throat, to the very brink of sufficiently, by a hand without a body? How else can I account for sister Laura standing over me where I sellned, ponning to the stolen p ate on the sofs, and lecturing me on my horrid propensities till she grew black in the lace, and her voice ruse to a wild unearthly scream which pierced through my brain.

When this tancy occurred, I started from my recumbent posture. A voice was actually in my ears, and a living form before my eyes; a lady stood contemplating me, with a half-erream on healips, and the color lading from her cheek; and as I moved, she would have fallen to the ground, had I not sprang up and caught her in my arms. I laid her soitly down in the fautett. Is was the morn-How long I had been in the house by this time. I

The boundaries of the room were dim and indistingt. Is it any wonder that I was in some considerable degree of perplexity as to whether I was not in the land of Greams?

"Madam," said I, "if you are a vision, it's of no consequence; but if not, I want particularly to get out."

no consequence; but if not, I want particularly to act out."
"Offer no injury," she replied in tremulous voice, "and no one will molest you. Take what you have come for, and begone."
"That is sooner said than done. The doors and windows below are locked and bolled; and tenesta those of this room the area is deep, and the sp.kes sharp. I assure you I have been in very considerable perjectity the whole of last right," and drawing a chair. I sat down in front of her. "I did not break; it is ar from teing my character. I assure you. But the area window was open, and so I just thought I would come in."

"You were attracted by the plate! take it fos Haven's sake, desperate man, and go away!"

"I did take some of it, but with no evil intentions—only by way of amusement. Here it is, and going over to the sois, I turew off the coven, and showed her the plate.

"You have been generous," said she, her voice getting quavarous again; "for the whole must have been in your power. I will let you out se soitly that no one will know. Put up in your poeters what you have risked so much to possess, and follow me."
